

What Le Pens means for the equity markets

Retrieved Monday 1st of May 2017 07:07:32 PM

The France election is over and the stock markets react immediately. A few hours after the opening of the trade, the German leading Dax could reach a new peak.The courses were up at 12.400 points. A relief rally?We can be curious.

France: is the euro risk averted?

Let us note that Macron has won as a liberal politician. With Le Pen together, there will be a key choice that will probably win the Lib Dax rising? It is likely that analysts now expect the euro to be more stable than before. Le Pen wanted to leave the Euro zone. Their chances are, however, low, so that, in the opposite direction, France is likely to remain the euro area.

But it can not be so easy on the financial markets. The euro zone was not in danger because of Le Pen, but because of the extreme participating nations. Le Pen is only saying loudly, which is what many people still think: for the great nations, it might be better to ge

In any case, many analysts and economists see this as a sensible option that could end the disaster around Greece, Italy and southern European countries.It should be borne in mind that we still have no solution to the problem of the sharp rise in liabilities in the euro area.

Recommendation
of
the Editorial-

[Elections
in France: Is
the gold
price
now exploding?](#)

No matter who becomes new president or new
president,
the times
are turbulent anyway.
Much
more important:

[Buy
the last 4
cheapest
gold
stocks
now!](#)

Interest remains a tragedy

The interest rate policy of the European Central Bank ECB continues to be a tragedy. The money is blown out. The ECB is buying bonds 60 billion. Month for month. Bonds, which would otherwise not otherwise be possible to find buyers on the market.

Who is paying? All those who have money. At first only those of us who put their money on accounts. There the interest rates are at least out any income, you pay directly. In addition, you also have to cope with capital life insurance or other interest rate arrangements, such as savings contracts.

Then we pay in the form of higher taxes. Whether the taxes rise, how high they rise, of course no one knows. This is a question of political will. The taxes are higher than they could be. This is important to know. Because we all stand for the Eurozone to bear the debt through the taxes that are still being made.

This is not affected by a few percentage points in France. Rather, the election in Great Britain is soon coming to the again. It will take time. Then Parliament will presumably have more EU drop-outs on board there than before. This could lead to an even faster exit from the eurozone. It is likely to promote the negotiations.

In short: You can observe the euphoria surrounding the France election with all serenity. The stock market is happy about an alleged recovery that was expected anyway. The real problems of the euro zone will only gradually be revealed. This is the real lever for you when you're in the market.

Shares are property values. The better the balance of companies in which you invest, the safer you are with your money. When the market has reached or reached a peak is irrelevant.

The
highest level
of all
times
in
the Dax
therefore does not matter
to you,
if you
are interested
in
the euro
and
the risks.
The
outlook
is good,
but not because
of
the France
election,
but because stocks
overall reduce
the risk.

Your

Julien Backhaus

PS

∴

Dear
reader,
at
the same moment,
when
the French
cast their ballot
papers into
the polls
and turned their eyes
all over Europe
to
the live tickers
of all
the media,
opens
in
the
background
something
much
more powerful \(click here\)

...

You
can find our imprint
under <http://www.pronomio.de/impressum>

